LOSS OF THE COLIMA.

Wrecked OFF the Mexican Coast

—Many Lives Lost.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 29.

The wreck of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's vessel, the Colima, off the coast of Manzanillo, Mexico, caused hundreds of people in this city yesterday to shed tears of bitter grief. While there exists at present an utter lack of any evidence tending to show that the sinking of the big vessel was attended by great loss of life, the relatives of the passengers, officers and crew fear the worst. Throughout the morning and afternoon yesterday the office of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, on First and Market streets, was crowded with visitors who anxiously inquired, yet feared to hear, the awful tale of death that was hourly expected from Manzanillo. Mothers, with tear-stained eyes, inquired for their sons, and had to content themselves with the meager details of the wreck which were contained in the dispatch received on Tuesday night by R. P. Schwerin, the vice-president and general manager of the company. That dispatch simply announced the names of eighteen out of nineteen passengers and members of the crew of the vessel who are known to have been saved from the wreck. For all that any one in San Francisco knew at a late hour last night every soul might have escaped safely from the sinking ship, but all efforts to settle that question proved unavailing. Telegram after telegram was sent to the company's agent at Manzanillo asking for particulars of the disaster and the names of the rescued and drowned. Hour after hour slipped by without any reply from the agent at the little Mexican seaport, and the crowds of anxious people who kept streaming into the company's office in the hope of learning the fate of friends or relatives would depart, some sobbing and crying, only to return an hour later and listen to the same distressing tale that the company was not yet in possession of any details of the disaster.

From all that can be learned of the shipwreck it is known that the Colima foundered off Manzanillo on Monday and that the passengers and crew took to the boats. Up to a late hour last night but one boat had been heard from, and that was the boat accounted for in the dispatch received by R. P. Schwerin. It turns out that the dispatch was sent to Mr. Schwerin by William G. Pitts, captain of the Pacific Mail steamer San Juan. The San Juan picked up the boatload of shipwrecked passengers off Manzanillo and carried them into port. Captain Pitts then forwarded a dispatch to this city, announcing briefly that the Colima had foundered and that fourteen passengers and five of the crew had been picked up in an open boat.

A dispatch of a most startling nature reached the city yesterday from Lloyd's, London. It was as follows:

"The steamer Colima is a total wreck. One hundred and sixty passengers and crew are drowned. Twenty-one are saved. Much bullion is lost."

The source of this information is not known, but the announcement of the loss of life was undoubtedly taken from the wires at the City of Mexico. The same information reached the city from other sources, but it appeared in the form of a rumor rather than an official or authentic statement, and was probably deduced from the fact that only one boatload of people has thus far put in an appearance.
